

JUSTICE FOR ALL

People don't change their minds about abortion.

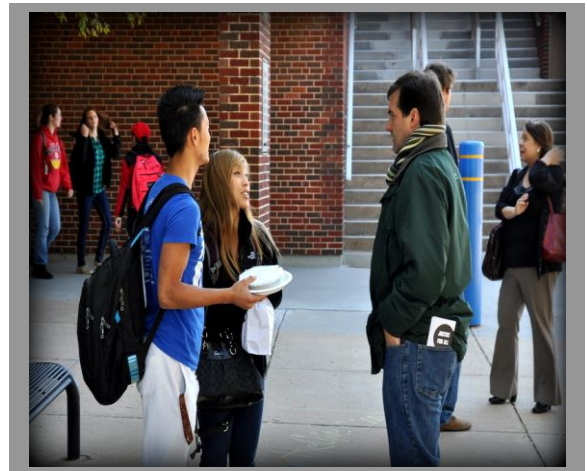

I stopped believing the above statement the first time I attended a campus outreach with Justice For All at Georgia Tech a year ago. Before that, I assumed that people had already heard all the arguments and nothing could sway them. But once on campus with Justice For All, my eyes were opened to the transformation that can occur in just a short conversation.

That day exposed me to hundreds of students who wanted to talk about abortion. They not only wanted to talk about it, but also to think about it. There was an unlimited opportunity for me and all the other volunteers to reach people and make an impact every minute of every day we were on campus.

My Journey

This experience is what convinced me that I needed to leave my business career and commit myself to working with Justice For All full time. I have been to many campuses with them since then, and I continually see the amazing impact on a person's life that a conversation about abortion can have.

Once a discussion about abortion is presented in a non-confrontational way, most people are eager to talk. After an hour-long conversation with one pro-choice student at the University of Central Oklahoma, she told me, "I never thought I could have a conversation about abortion like this."

A student at the University of North Texas initially told me, "I am pro-choice, but I don't want to argue about it." I told her we could definitely agree about that -- I didn't want to argue either. After she realized that abortion doesn't have to be a cause for argument, but rather an opportunity for reasonable discourse, she and I had a thirty-minute conversation that really made her uncomfortable with her pro-choice stance.

Changed Hearts Lead to Changed Behaviors

I truly believe that the real value in these conversations is that they have a chance to impact future behaviors and choices. Each conversation about abortion could save a life, or many lives. Even if the people we speak to won't have to make a decision for themselves, many of their friends will, and those friends may come for guidance to the ones you are reaching and teaching.

The Journey Continues

Justice For All continues to train thousands to have these types of conversations and gives them the tools to make a real difference in people's lives. When I reach my support raising goal in the next few months, I will join the Justice For All team full time.

If I haven't gotten in touch with you yet, I look forward to speaking to you about how you can participate with me in this life-saving work.
