

Cass and the JFA Exhibit

“The JFA Exhibit made me realize that I was advocating killing the very children that I want to someday teach.”

*Hi, my name is Cass.
Two days ago I was pro-choice.”*

Monday afternoon, February 19, 2001. The Justice For All Exhibit traveled to the University of Texas at Austin (UTA). The student pictured above named Cass, put down her “MY BODY, MY CHOICE” sign and literally sat down to talk with the UT Justice For All (JFA) student organization president, Jeremy Alder (see below).

Wednesday evening, February 21, 2001. Cass attended the UTA JFA student organization regular meeting. She introduced herself by saying: “Hi, my name is Cass. Two days ago I was pro-choice.”

Cass explained that she was shocked when she saw the JFA Exhibit. She had never seen abortion before. “The Exhibit forced me to admit that abortion kills children. I plan to be an elementary education teacher. So how could I continue advocating killing the very children I someday want to teach?”

Thursday, February 22, 2001. Cass joined UT student Denise Jones (left) to defend the Exhibit. She spent nearly the entire day sharing her conversion with other students. Perhaps the most startling is that despite having a sincere faith in Christ, the Exhibit did what no one else had required Cass to do: apply both science and faith to the abortion debate.

The Alan Guttmacher Institute continues to report that the abortion rate among women who claim the name of Christ is only marginally distinguishable from women who claim no faith at all. However, because of JFA students like Jeremy and Denise, and the Justice For All Staff and Exhibit, Cass had the opportunity to see the Exhibit and understand the truth about abortion. By God’s grace, she will not become yet another abortion statistic. And thankfully, neither will any of her children.
